The three pillars of interpersonal relations according to Schutz are: Inclusion, Control and Openness

1. INCLUSION

- There are two underlying questions behind this term:
 - Sense of belonging to the group (or in the relationship): "I belong to the group that is being constructed"
 - Feeling of being important to the group: "I am important because I have a role to play in the group (or in this relationship)". I have the right to be given time, I have the right to speak out.
- The idea is that in order to establish a cooperative relationship each person must:
 - Acknowledge that they are important
 - Feel that they are important to the other person
 - Acknowledge the importance of the other person
 - See that the other person is aware of their own importance

2. CONTROL

- This notion includes:
 - Power (who is in charge?, who is the leader?, how are decisions made?)
 - The contribution of each person (what is each person's contribution, including my own?)
- A cooperative relationship can more easily be established if each person:
 - has acknowledged that they are competent
 - feels competent vis-à-vis the other person
 - has acknowledged that the other person is competent
 - has seen that the other person is aware that he/she is competent
- The operational outcome is a personal awareness of being responsible and accountable, i.e. capable of providing an answer.

3. OPENNESS

- This notion comprises the fact of:
 - Feeling at one with oneself and with others (not hiding behind a mask, being close to self)
 - Having confidence and trust in oneself, in the other person, in the situation
- Above and beyond individual importance and competence, openness invites us to:
 - consider the perception that we have of our own amiability and our likeability.
 - acknowledge the most vulnerable parts of our own humanity. A person who is humane is one who is able to recognise that they are contingent upon others and can be hurt.

INCLUSION – IN PRACTICE

Key stake – what is the purpose of inclusion?

- to provide each participant with the opportunity to find fulfilment in the group that is just beginning to form – "I am in" and "I am important".
- to enable each person to find their place and belong to the group as it develops, to "get warmed up".
- to break the ice with others in a fun, recreational way.
- to leave everything that has gone before joining the group behind them so as to be totally focused on the present, and the future.
- to get people physically and mentally involved.
- to work on group inclusion, by taking part in this game.

The process – how to structure inclusion?

The inclusion process comprises the following elements:

- An invitation to reconnect with one's own human self, something that can be done on one of several different ways, for example by stimulating the right-side of the brain, by enabling people to be more in touch with their emotions and with their body or by moving away from a purely mental register.
- In-group exchanges in order to:
 - get to know one another better, nurture relationships,
 - establish a climate of mutual trust,
 - enhance group cohesion.
- Clearly agreed and accepted rules:
 - Open participation, with total self-respect: i.e. I choose what to say about myself and what not to say.
 - Total authenticity – no place for irony or sarcasm or for making fun of what other people say to me.

Contents of inclusion

- The potential range of inclusion activities is almost without limits – much will depend on the creativity of the process lead.
- Here are just a few illustrative examples:
 - Two concentric circles that will enable team members to answer a question in pairs and then to change partners.
 - Brainstorming questions that will enable each person to clarify:
 - Their own requirements vis-à-vis the group,
 - Their own contribution
 - Their own personal obstacles,
 - Other, more offbeat questions & issues.
 - Use of a metaphor, an image, a photograph
